In the last several years, the Great Lakes have experienced destructive and toxic algae blooms. Phosphorus from farm runoff combined with favorable weather and lake conditions are producing large and dangerous blooms. Researchers note that if land management practices and climate change trends continue, the lake is likely to see more blooms, putting fish, livestock, and humans at risk.

Join us for a conversation with Jeffrey M. Reutter, Ph.D., retired Director of the Ohio Sea Grant College Program and Stone Laboratory at The Ohio State University. He will discuss how Lake Erie works, its history of both degradation and rehabilitation, the current harmful algal blooms and dead zone, and what needs to happen to fix them.
